rice plays a central role in the diet in bangladesh and as a source of income for farmers although bangladesh has largely liberalized international trade in rice it maintains a public food distribution system to stabilize prices distributing an average of 2 million tons of rice per year at a cost of almost us 800 million per year this study explores whether alternative policies could achieve similar stabilization at a lower cost it uses a stochastic spatial equilibrium model of rice markets to simulate monthly prices in eight regions of the country stochastic shocks are used to simulate fluctuations in regional production replicating historical patterns at the region season level as well as inter regional correlation in production shocks it also simulates fluctuation in world rice prices mimicking the mean variance and serial correlation of historical wholesale prices of rice in delhi public procurement and distribution follow historic averages by month and region private storage is represented by a simplified version of rational expectations models in which net storage is a non linear function of availability in the previous month one set of simulations tests alternative levels of distribution finding that cutting distribution to 1 million tons would have minimal effects on the level of rice price stability another set of simulations tested different import tariff levels including the baseline rate of 25 % we find that lower tariffs result in both lower rice prices and less price instability as world rice prices tend to be more stable than local prices simulating a buffer stock with different price bands shows that a narrow band can achieve high price stability but at a high fiscal cost a 20 t/kg USD 0.26/kg price band generates similar price stabilization at a lower cost compared to current policy however it is difficult to set the right purchase and sale price and many simulations result in exhausting reserves or reaching warehouse capacity an adaptive buffer stock in which the price is adjusted as the stock runs too low or too high solves some of these problems in general the study finds that current procurement and distribution patterns do not match well with the regional and monthly patterns of surplus and deficit possibly reflecting multiple and conflicting goals of the public food distribution system
